Introduction

This listing of trading vessels, by which we mean vessels transporting cargo and passengers to their advertised destinations, is intended to complement our other lists of trading steamships (and later motor vessels) which operated with sailings originating in Hong Kong. The main shipping company operating coastwise northward from Hong Kong until the mid-20th century was the Douglas S.S. Co., sailing under the British flag and covered in our work as an entity on its own. The firm had originated in the mid-19th century using an evolving design of passenger-cum-cargo vessel. For most of its life, Douglas was close to a monopoly, in a tradeoff whereby the much larger British

Swire and Jardine fleets accessed ports such as Swatow, Amoy, Foochow and those in Taiwan only as way ports on their longer routes, which Douglas in turn did not challenge.

The situation partially changed after the Chinese government ceded the island of Formosa (Taiwan) to Japan in 1895, and eager to develop the island and create new ports at Keelung and Kaohsiung, the Japanese Taiwan administration heavily subsidised Osaka Shosen Kaisha K.K. (O.S.K.) to develop and maintain a web of routes from Taiwan to Hong Kong, Dalian and all the main ports in between, as well as southwards to Java and Haiphong. Douglas consequentially withdrew from the Taiwan trade to focus on its core routes between Hong Kong and the coastal ports of Swatow, Amoy and Foochow and it was able to continue to predominate on these routes.

In October 1939 a reorganization transferred most of the Japanese-flag vessels trading on the China coast and Yangtse to a new company, the Japanese government-sponsored Toa Kaiun (East Asia Navigation Co. Ltd), thus replacing O.S.K. on its routes to Taiwan and elsewhere in China. Also around this time, Douglas temporarily ceased its normal operations owing to the war-like conditions, so Toa Kaiun alone was able to run on all the northward routes until August 1945.

Douglas returned with a one-ship operation to Swatow, Amoy, Foochow and Taiwan from 1946 to March 1949 when it ceased to offer services. In the post-1945 environment which reserved trading between Chinese ports (excluding Hong Kong) to Chinese companies alone, Douglas had found itself challenged by the two main British companies squeezed out of their coastal trades, and as well as by smaller Hong Kong-registered British-flag ships, which predominated following Douglas's exit.

These small vessels continued to operate following establishment of the People's Republic of China in October 1949, in the early years risking attack and capture by Nationalist forces. However, regular advertised voyages by identifiable private trading ships from Hong Kong to the Chinese coastal ports appear to have ceased by the end of 1951, being replaced by vessels controlled by the PRC.

Here we list the non-Douglas non-PRC ships trading on these routes. The vessels were all essentially of the combination or 'combi' type with substantial passenger (mainly deck passenger) and cargo capacities, there being good demand for both types of customer. As in some other parts of the world, some passengers were in a category in between - carrying goods such as perishables in commercial but portable quantities.

The study breaks into three sections. The first covers services between Hong Kong and Taiwan after they became a Japanese monopoly from the beginning of the 20th century. Of course, from around 1940 sailings from Hong Kong to Swatow, Amoy and Foochow had become Japan-dominated as well, largely with the same ships which sailed to Taiwan. It continues with the handful of British-flag trading ships which operated from Hong Kong to Taiwan from 1947, until passenger services ceased in 1972.

The second section covers the small ships of various companies trading from Hong Kong to the coastal ports from 1945 until the end of the 1950s, when they were largely replaced by PRC-flag vessels (refer our lists of the ships of the Shanghai and Guangzhou Maritime Bureaus). The listing in this second section is tentative and somewhat amorphous – it has been difficult to obtain precise information as to which vessels to include and which not to include and which ships called into what ports, but in cases where we have a specific record we have bolded the port names in the entry. In the early years vessels calling into Swatow and Amoy from Hong Kong were mostly under 1000gt, but by the late-1950s some were of 2000gt or more.

The third section deals, in subheadings by route, with an array of cargo-passenger ships that emerged Hong Kong northward following the liberalization of shipping operations in China by Deng Xiao-ping from 1978. Many of these were state-owned or quasi state-owned enterprises, owned by the Shanghai and Guangzhou Maritime Bureaus or by local governments in ports such as Shantou (Swatow) and Xiamen (Amoy). The vessels operated under the PRC flag or under flags of convenience and Shanghai - not part of the former Douglas S.S. Co. operations – also became a major destination out of Hong Kong, operated by two companies. However the operations described in this section only lasted until around the year 2000. The PRC had now developed the cheap and fast passenger alternatives of coach and air travel, and in any case, from 1997 voyaging between Hong Kong and the PRC technically had become domestic, subject to cabotage arrangements under the interim two system policy.

Our study does not cover containerships or fast catamaran ferries, or, with their quite different purposes, the many cruise and casino-type vessels.

In the lists below, the dates after the ship's name refer to the period the vessel traded between Hong Kong and China coast ports indicated.

1. Non-Douglas Hong Kong-Taiwan

As noted in our Douglas S.S. Co. history, the Hong Kong-Taiwan passenger and cargo service in fact had originally been a route of DSSC that had been squeezed out by a subsidised Osaka Shosen Kaisha mail service in the early years of the 20th century.

Following Japan's takeover of Taiwan in 1895 the newly set up colonial government signed a contract with Osaka Shosen Kaisha, one of Japan's two leading shipping companies, to provide a mail ship service between Tamsui port at the mouth of the Tamsui river running through Keelung and Hong Kong, via Amoy and Swatow. Chinese-flag vessels were of course, ineligible to run steamship services between the British and Japanese colonies. O.S.K.'s appearance resulted in sharp competition with Douglas S.S. Co. and at an early stage there was even an idea to buy out

Douglas S.S. Co, but O.S.K. was firmly able to establish itself in the trade. Douglas was unable to compete on sailings to Taiwan, in 1900 withdrawing from their Hong Kong-Anping line and the end of 1902 also terminating their longstanding Hong Kong-Tamsui service.

The O.S.K. weekly service commenced in April 1899 with the Sumidagawa Maru and Maizuru Maru, and O.S.K. gained use of a pier for its Taiwan services (including that to Kaohsiung) on the Victoria waterfront. From 1905 completely new purpose-built vessels Daijin Maru and Daigi Maru were introduced but the Russo-Japanese War caused services to be cut back and the latter vessel was soon diverted to North China. From April 1915 the starting point was officially changed to the newly developed port of Keelung, somewhat further north and the ship employed from this time onwards were the Daijin Maru and the Kaijo Maru. In 1925 the Hozan Maru replaced the Daijin Maru and in 1930 the Canton Maru, specially built with anti-piracy measures, replaced the Kaijo Maru. In 1936 a second new vessel, the turbine-powered Hong Kong Maru was added, allowing three sailings per fortnight, but the anti-Japanese boycotts of 1937 resulted in the service being reduced to Hong Kong Maru or on occasion Canton Maru as the sole ship. In October 1939 the line together with the latter two ships passed to the government-sponsored Toa Kaiun (East Asia Navigation Co. Ltd) which now ran the Japanese-flag China coastal services.

In April 1900 O.S.K. also received a Japanese mail contract to run a weekly service from Anping (the port of Tainan municipality north of Kaohsiung to Hong Kong via Amoy and Swatow, known as the Anping-Hong Kong line, using the Anping Maru. In 1907 the contract was revised and the service was extended to Canton and thereafter was known as the Kaohsiung-Canton line using Soshu Maru, still basically a single ship service although Anping Maru was retained for a period operating a direct service. In February 1924 Kotsu Maru was introduced and in June 1927 Deli Maru and Fukuken Maru. From 1938 Busho Maru and Seikyo Maru, both of the six-ship Fukuken Maru Class were used, and the next year the service passed, with some of the ships, to Toa Kaiun.

Further subsidized branch services were added in May 1900 from Foochow to Swatow (this service ceased in March 1905), in October 1900 from Hong Kong to Foochow (became a Shanghai-Foochow service in April 1905) and in March 1901 from Foochow a short distance south to Hinghwa in Fukien Province (ceased in March 1905). From 1902 to 1905 subsidised routes were operated with two smaller chartered ships from Amoy to Shima at Longhai and Amoy to nearby Tong'an on the mainland. In 1905 an O.S.K. service was commenced from Tamsui to Foochow (ceased in January 1909) and in 1907 Anping was replaced by the newly developed port of Takao (Chinese reading Kaohsiung), and in April 1915 Tamsui was replaced by the new Keelung. In Oct 1919 a subsidised Keelung-Amoy line was started, in 1920 amended to Keelung-Foochow.

The World War II years are not recorded in detail, but the main operator until 1945 remained Toa Kaiun, with a dwindling fleet and also some co-opted ships. This company was then formally abolished in November 1946 by Decree No.563 of the Supreme Commander of Allied Powers in Japan.

O.S.K. and Toa Kaiun had large fleets, and while the ships named below are the principal ones operating Hong Kong northward, a few other ships of the fleet were rotated in for short periods, and there were some charters. When Japanese ships called at Chinese ports and Hong Kong, it is understood that they were only able to load and offload cargoes and passengers to and from the Taiwan ports.

In mid-1946 Haiyang of Douglas S.S. Co. actually extended its recommenced sailings to Taiwan, now returned to China, thereby reviving a trade which the company had been driven out of some forty years earlier, but this was to be shortlived.

With the evacuation of the Nationalists from the mainland to Taiwan, the latter became a logical northern destination for the few remaining Swire and Jardines coastal passenger ships. In keeping with the 1943 Treaty of Chungking restricting foreign-flag operation between Chinese ports, Jardines had set up a service between Hong Kong and Shanghai via Keelung using the passenger vessel Wing Sang as early as in mid-1947. In mid-1949 this was truncated to a weekly Hong Kong-Keelung shuttle with road and rail connections through to the capital, Taipei. By November 1949 Swires placed Shengking (3,001/31), displaced from its longstanding northern express service, on the same run and the two ships offered a coordinated schedule, usually passing at night and exchanging pleasantries by Aldis lamp.

Wing Sang was 3,560 grt and 328 feet overall. With quadruple expansion engines, instead of the usual big low-pressure cylinder, there were two smaller LP cylinders on either side of the HP and IP cylinders plus a Gotaverken exhaust turbine inserted before the condenser. That gave a better balance for an engine that ran at a high 125 rpm for a maximum speed of about 14 knots and also economised on fuel. That margin of 2-2½ knots over the usual 11.5 (maximum 12) knots made Wing Sang Jardine's best ship for the fast coastal run. Like some Jardine steamers of the 1920s and the more recent Tak Sang she had goalpost masts and long derricks for ease of lightering cargo. A new feature was solid steel hatch covers that lifted back fore and aft away from the mast houses and their electric winches.

The slightly smaller Shengking (3,059 grt and 304 feet) had been built with a sister, Shuntien (a war loss) for CNC's traditional Shanghai-Tientsin express service. More expensive to operate, and with a smaller cargo capacity, she was specifically designed for speed, being fitted with twin Brown Curtis steam turbines with single reduction gear boxes, and with 3400 shp was capable of reaching 20 knots although normally operated at around 15.

The Keelung shuttle was a weekly round trip with an occasional intermediate call at the southern port of Kaohsiung. The distance to Keelung was around 540 nautical miles through Taiwan Strait and at 14 knots took about 40-42 hours each way. Except late in the typhoon season, the prevailing swell came down the Strait from the northeast and, a former crew member tells us, could be rugged. This had the interesting effect that when the ship made the 90-degree turn to go around the northern tip of the island, the motion changed suddenly from pitching to rolling, on occasion throwing passengers out of their bunks. Departure was from Hong Kong or Keelung at around 1800, then a full day at sea with arrival in Keelung later the next day to disembark passengers and discharge inbound cargo. The British crews were forbidden to go ashore in retaliation for British shipping and trade with Communist China. Outbound cargo would be loaded the following day for sailing after just the one night in port. On the return from Keelung there was seldom much cargo, a few hundred tons of general, but in season fruit such as bananas and pineapples.

A third party to the Hong Kong-Taiwan service appeared when Yee Tai Hong commenced a Hong Kong-Kaohsiung line in January 1950 with the smaller chartered Oriental Phoenix (2,256 grt and 285 feet, controlled by C.Y. Tung, father of the first Hong Kong Chief Executive C.H. Tung). The ship was withdrawn at the end of the 12 months charter period.

The Wing Sang was also withdrawn, in 1954, but the CNC service continued successively with Szechuen, Anking and from 1970 Taiwan, a new technology Scandinavian unit load ferry. By the early 1970s, however, air travel had become the preferred means of travel for the passengers, mainly students, and Taiwan was returned to Scandinavia early in 1972. She did, however, later return to Hong Kong for an extended career for other owners on the Xiamen, Haikou and Shantou routes as explained below.

SUMIDAGAWA MARU 隅田川丸 (1899-15) 749/87 56.36x7.61m T3cy 82nhp 422ihp
Built by Short Bros, Pallion, Sunderland (#171) for Wetherley, Mead & Hussey, London as HERONGATE. 11/89 sold O.S.K. r. SUMIDAGAWA MARU. 27/3/15 sold to Kitanihon Kisen K.K. 5/8/27 ran aground off Sakhalin and sank.

2. Non-Douglas Swatow, Amoy and Foochow

The only notable serious opposition to Douglas S.S. Co. on its northern coastwise routes pre-World War II was by Chiu On S.S. Co. Ltd between Hong Kong and Swatow in Kwangtung province in the period 1920-36. This company was formed by merchants in Swatow and operated under British registry in Hong Kong, presumably with the strategy of undercutting rates. Services appear to have been successfully operated with a converted Royal Navy frigate, Hydrangea, equipped with a white-painted superstructure and two funnels with a distinctive houseflag and funnel markings. The vessel was stranded by a typhoon in 1936 and seems not to have been replaced. Chiu On S.S. Co. is also listed as the buyer in 1925 of the former Pacific Mail steamer China (5060/89) which had recently been operated by another Chinese company across the Pacific, but this vessel was immediately resold for breaking.

Post-World War II, with Douglas down to a one ship operation, Swatow, Amoy and Foochow attracted calls in the period to 1949 by cargo vessels with limited passenger capacity on regular sailings between Hong Kong and Shanghai. Swire vessels included Tsinan, the express passenger steamer Shengking and the Swire-chartered Heinrich Jessen (operating to the Straits). It appears that Douglas’s sole operational ship postwar, Haiyang, was fully engaged in calling into other ports and did not resume regular services into Foochow.

From around 1947 a number of small Hong Kong-based ships (detailed below, each having a British Master, Chief Officer and Chief Engineer) gradually advertised regular sailings between Hong Kong, Swatow and in some cases Amoy, but these operations, often hazardous from 1949 because of the risk of interception by Nationalist gunboats, terminated by the end of April 1951. In this early period ships running between Hong Kong/Canton and ports such as Swatow were relatively new warbuilt types.

In the late-1940s Wheelock Marden & Co. acquired 46 surplus 'Flower Class' corvettes with an eye to conversion into small merchant ships for operation in the Far East. Most of these vessels were ultimately resold for breaking, but three vessels are known to have been placed in mercantile service operating to Amoy and/or Foochow. Two with a Foochow connection were the British-flag but probably PRC-owned Hydralock and Nigelock, still registered to Wheelocks. A sister Cloverlock is recorded as having operated to Amoy post-1949, but may have also operated to Foochow. These vessels had a quadruple expansion engine of 2750ihp, with a designed maximum speed of 16 knots, handy in dealing with any pursuits by pirates or Nationalist warships.

Special mention is also deserved for the five sturdily built 600gt former U.S. Army 'Freight and Supply' (FS) class - Edith Moller, Ethel Moller, Elsie Moller, Barina and Torina - each with two 500hp diesel engines and capable of 13knots.

Stuart Williamson, former General Manager of Douglas S.S. Co. operated the Empire 'B-type coaster Empire Park (1350/46), advertised in Chinese as the Haimun, a traditional Douglas S.S. name. The Ta Hing company was notable in operating several ships, first managed by Moller & Co. and subsequently by Wallem & Co.

The PLA captured Amoy and Swatow in October 1949 and from around this time, vessels calling at these ports did so at the risk of interception by Nationalist gunboats. The U.K. recognized the PRC on 6 January 1950, thereby facilitating calls in these ports by British-flag ships which were protected by the Royal Navy against the frequently occurring interference. Thus from 1951 the PRC relied upon charters of cargo ships managed in Hong Kong (especially by Wheelock Marden, Wallem & Co., Mollers & Co. and John Manners & Co.). This situation continued to around 1960.

The listed vessels are those believed to have operated in this period out of Hong Kong to Swatow and Amoy. Foochow's location north of Taiwan meant that from 1949 the Nationalist embargo particularly interfered with vessels sailing between Hong Kong and Foochow, so the ships, principally PRC-chartered British and flag of convenience vessels managed from Hong Kong, generally carried their Foochow cargoes to and from Shanghai.

This is a work in progress list, and there are likely to be a number of inaccuracies and vessels which we have not yet managed to pick up, so contributions of information or photographs would be much appreciated.

The Post-1978 Renaissance

The accession to power of Deng Xiaoping in 1978 resulted in major changes to China's shipping arrangements, as the bans on non-state controlled shipowning and the raising of capital for commercial purposes were lifted. The movement of people became easier even though at the time of writing (2021) it remains still somewhat constrained by the regional residency system. Nonetheless, seaborne passenger travel out of Guangzhou and Hong Kong to coastal ports further north enjoyed a resurgence from 1980, notably fostered by the local authorities in the provinces of Guangdong and Fujian and ports such as Shantou, Xiamen, and the newly established (1988) city of Shanwei.

Prominent early operators in this period were the local government-sponsored Guangdong, Hong Kong & Macao Navigation Co. (GHMNC) and Fujian Province Shg Co. (FPSC) but these were soon supplemented by other, smaller private operators. The employment of ships, often second- or third- hand vessels from European owners and the services tended to change frequently, probably reflecting the low profitability of operations, but some vessels appeared well suited to their routes and lasted for close to 20 years.

Eventually the technology became outmoded – by the turn of the century the mainland motorway networks had become extensive and bus travel was deregulated, offering cheaper and faster forms of travel, together with low-priced air travel for the top of the market. Some of the ships were transferred to Panamanian registry for use on casino cruises out of Hong Kong which had become popular, while others were sold for use out of Shanghai and in North China, but the majority soon ended up in scrap yards and were not replaced, essentially finally ending the northward passenger shipping services dating back to 1860. The final holdouts in the 21st century were Tong Hu to Shantou, Hai Da to Shanghai, and Jimei, the former Prinsesse Ragnhild, for many years continuing to sail to Xiamen, even under the Panamanian flag, but her owners ultimately finding operating as a casino ship to be a more attractive proposition.

The post-1978 ships, often of smart appearance, made attractive material for ship photography of the time, and we have been fortunate that one of the most enthusiastic photographers, Donald Anderson, has made available his photographs for us to use. We would welcome further contributions of information and photographs that add materially to or correct what we have published below.

FUJIAN as GREEN COAST capsized at Luanda (Wikimapia).

YU JIN XIANG (1995-c.97) 12304/95-11 (see entry in Hong Kong-Shanghai section)

ZI DING XIANG/ARAFURA LILY (1996-c.97) 12307/96-5 (ditto)

Post 1978: Hong Kong/Shanwei

The city port of Shanwei, located 81 nautical miles north of Hong Kong, was established in 1988 based on the city of Swabue which gained its prefectural and administrative independence from Huizhou during the Nationalist period. A number of polluting industries have been transferred there from Shenzhen. Dong Hu was used as the principal connection with Hong Kong, but road access has now greatly improved.

DONG HU 東湖 (1985-9?) 1254/67

Built by Union Naval Valencia, Valencia for Cia. Trasmediterranea, Valencia as SANTA MARIA DE LA PAZ. 1984 registered as MARIA, sold to Guangdong Province, Hong Kong and Macao Navigation Co. Ltd., Guangzhou, 1985 r. DONG HU for Hong Kong/Shanwei service. 2013 RLR.

DONG HU at Kowloon 13/11/96, derricks removed (D. Cromby).

Post 1978: Hong Kong-Shanghai

Shanghai route HAI HUA, HAI XING and JIN JIANG at Hong Kong in December 1992 (Donald Anderson).

In the second part of the 19th and first part of the 20th centuries, passenger sailings between Hong Kong and Shanghai formed part of the regular operations of international shipping companies and the cargo ships of the coastal shipping companies.

From the 1970s travel in China by coastal cargo-passenger ships expanded rapidly and a large fleet of such ships, principally of the Shanghai Maritime Bureau had been built, but not being constructed to international classification standards the ships were unable to sail to Hong Kong. With China's liberalization and increased international travel under Deng Xiao-ping it thus became appropriate to acquire secondhand combination cargo-passenger ships from abroad for the new Shanghai-Hong Kong route, sometimes calling at Xiamen.

The two operators were Shanghai Hai Xing Shg. Co., closely connected to the Shanghai Maritime Bureau and the evidently privately owned Jin Jiang Shg Co. The ships attracted international travelers and residents of Hong Kong and Taiwan as well as coastal cargoes, and seemed to be viable for a period of up to about 2000 when they reached the end of their economic lives, although Hai Da ex Centaur served for 20 years. As replacements, in the mid-1990s Shanghai Hai Xing ordered four new combi vessels with flower names, two from the Netherlands and a larger pair from Germany, but the falling demand for sea travel meant that only three of the ships are known to have served Hong Kong, briefly. All were quickly transferred to differed ownerships and currently (2021) operate between Bohai Gulf ports and Incheon in South Korea. All are included at the end of this list. Jin Jiang Shg Co. reinvested in purely cargo tonnage, wearing that company's distinctive markings.

Again, we are most grateful to Donald Anderson for his contribution of beautiful photographs taken in Hong Kong, and to the other photographers.
